Dear Mr Snow:

I talked to my ^{newer} friend recently who takes groups of young people & Lester Snow rafting and who is ^{so} opposed to dams on those rafting rivers - basically because dams are an invasion of the wilderness. He has experience with in which these young parolees thrive: he feels it helps them stay on the right path. That is just one reason I oppose dams.

I just feel sometimes there are so many potent negative forces in the world that we have to form our own. I mean with positive approaches. Perhaps this is why Philosophical but I see the construction of more dams as one of the negative forces. It's an invasion of the wilderness. It helps natural wildlife habitats die, it lines the pockets of corporations and housing developers (who rarely develop affordable housing), it's anti-conservation, pollution, anti-birds (deadly to fish, it's just an anti-car for the earth approach). I'm not alone in the feel this. Sincerely, Ann Beaudet
